

Preview of Q1 GDP (17 June, 10:45am) and current account (16 June, 10:45am).

- We expect a 0.6% rise in GDP for the March quarter, after a 1.0% drop in December.
- Strong domestic demand appears to have outweighed the loss of from the absence of international tourists over the summer period.
- The strong housing market has been an engine for economic growth, providing a tailwind for some industries.
- We expect the current account deficit to widen in the March quarter, due to the loss of tourist earnings and a rebound in demand for imports.

Q1 GDP, 17 June.

We estimate that GDP rose by 0.6% in the March quarter, a partial unwinding of the 1% drop in the December quarter last year. This would put the level of activity slightly below its pre-Covid peak, and more significantly, about 4% short of where we would have expected the economy to be if Covid hadn't happened.

This is an upgrade from our initial forecast of a flat quarterly result, which was essentially an acknowledgement that things could go either way. The absence of overseas tourists was expected to weigh more heavily on the economy over the summer months, but this was countered by an ongoing rebound in domestic demand. The data released over the last week or so suggest that the latter won out over the March quarter.

There's still a high degree of uncertainty around our forecast, given the challenges that Stats NZ faces in measuring the impact of Covid on activity. But as we've noted previously, we wouldn't regard a weak result as a sign of a 'double dip' recession; rather, the loss of overseas tourism has disrupted the normal seasonal patterns in spending. The flipside of this is that we expect a strong lift in growth through the middle part of this year.

Our forecast is likely to be well within the range of market forecasts. Financial markets also appear to be braced for a solid lift in activity over the quarter, although a weaker than expected result would probably only prompt a minor reaction.

We expect a much stronger result than the 0.6% drop that the Reserve Bank forecast in its May Monetary Policy Statement (which didn't have the benefit of the activity indicators that have been published recently). On the face of it, that might prompt the RBNZ to bring forward its expected timing of OCR hikes even further. However, we're still sceptical that by next year the evidence on inflation pressures will be enough to warrant rate hikes. Indeed, the strong pace of growth in domestic activity actually argues against the idea that we're running up against capacity constraints.

In terms of the details, we expect the strongest contributions to come from wholesale trade (up 3.9%), construction (up 2.8%) and non-food manufacturing (up 2.3%). The strong housing market is likely to have contributed to these sectors in various ways, both boosting household spending and generating demand for construction materials.

Other positive drivers include the continued strong growth in the public sector, and a 0.5% rise in retail spending, led by hospitality. A lift in milk production boosted the agricultural sector, although food manufacturing overall was held back by a drop in meat and wine volumes.

The main weak spots in March quarter activity relate to natural resources in one way or another. The mining sector saw a further decline in oil and gas extraction, while low hydro lake levels saw both a drop in total electricity generation and a greater reliance on more expensive sources.

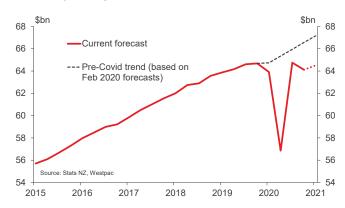

The March quarter included a short period of Covid restrictions, with Auckland returning to Alert Level 3 for a total of eleven days. However, the data that we've seen for the quarter reinforces what we suspected from previous episodes: short periods of restrictions largely result in activity being delayed rather than lost altogether. Given that the restrictions happened in the middle of the quarter, it's likely that the 'catchup' period has already been captured in the March quarter figures.

Q1 Balance of Payments, 16 June.

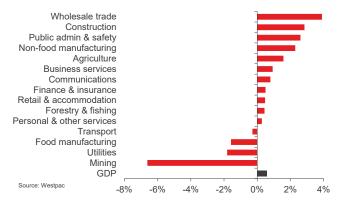

We expect the annual current account deficit to widen to 2.1% of GDP in the March quarter, after having narrowed to a 19-year low of 0.8% late last year. The main factor is the lack of the usual lift in overseas visitor spending at this time of year. This will see the deficit widen further over the rest of 2021, with a broad-based resumption of overseas travel not expected to begin until next year.

Meanwhile, the March quarter goods balance (in seasonally adjusted terms) is also likely to tip back into negative territory. Importantly, import volumes continue to rebound after last year's dramatic drop during the Covid lockdown. A temporary dip in export volumes of around 2.5% is likely to add to the weakness in the goods balance over the quarter.
